Reviewer's report:

They have responded to my only previous suggestion which was to seek out Mol's book on diabetes management as a social practice situated in complex care networks. They have not really drawn on the philosophical aspects of the book (my main reason for recommending it), but rather have included some very concrete recommendations ("Mol says X should happen") which need to be presented in a less essentialist way or omitted entirely. I don't think Mol was intending to give any instructions to anyone! The longest red section in the revised manuscript is what I was really after, and I wonder if this could be shifted to the introduction so as to ground the paper better.

Level of interest: An article whose findings are important to those with closely related research interests

Quality of written English: Needs some language corrections before being published

Statistical review: No, the manuscript does not need to be seen by a statistician.
