Title: The Structure of Psychological Life Satisfaction: Insights from farmers and a general community sample in Australia

Version: 3 Date: 2 September 2012

Reviewer's report:

The authors have nicely revised and reorganised the manuscript. They propose a novel way of examining psychological life satisfaction to gain insight into health promotion and policy. I think the study is a coherent and original addition to knowledge, and a useful contribution to the life satisfaction literature, especially studies of the Personal Wellbeing Index.

However, whilst I agree that the study is original, and the findings important, the contribution to the field of Public Health is open to discussion. In particular, the study quantified the structure of psychological life satisfaction within two samples without examining further public health processes.
