Title: A blind area of family planning services in China: unintended pregnancy among unmarried graduate students

Version: 1 Date: 25 July 2012

Reviewer's report:

This is an interesting and important study which helps to better understand the prevalence of premarital sex and unintended pregnancy among graduate students, and the risk factors of these. This is of great public health relevance in light of the improvement of family planning services and contraceptive education in China. However, in general I feel the authors need to provide greater clarity with respects to the study background, methodology and further examine the discussion of their results is required.

I suggest that the manuscript will be reconsidered for publication after major revision.
