Title: What are the learning outcomes of a postgraduate training course in dermatology for primary care doctors?

Version: 1 Date: 18 November 2010

Reviewer's report:

I think this is an interesting paper that provides some evidence that family doctors can be trained to provide high quality care for patients with skin conditions. The major problem is that this cannot be stated to strongly. I think the authors should strengthen their comments about limitations of a self-report study with a 43% response rate. They might also like to cite a paper by Raasch B et al (I think in the Journal of Continund Medical Education?) that went further, by measuring accuracy of diagnosis of excised skin tumours before and after an educational intervention
