Reviewer's report:

Major Compulsory Revisions: I have no Major Compulsory Revisions.

Minor Essential Revisions: If the target audience is a US-based publication, I recommend that the authors consider changing the way that illness are grouped in Table 1. I also recommend changing the category of “unspecific” in the “Results” section (where one-third of illnesses are described as "unspecific"). "Unspecific" is not a commonly used term in the U.S. Also, in U.S. literature, a "cut" or a "pinch" or a "sprain" would not be considered a surgical injury. Instead it would be a "minor trauma". Or a "sprain" might be considered "orthopedic".

Since the group of “unspecified” visits was so large, I think this needs more explanation. What types of conditions are “unspecified”? Are they unspecified since you don’t know what the diagnosis or the patient complaint was? Or are they unspecified since the patient complaint was not clear ... like a person coming to be seen by doctors but the person says that nothing is wrong? Or are they unspecified, since the doctor did not record the reason for the patient visit? To me, “headache” is a very vague and non-specific complaint, but it is listed separately from “unspecified” in Table 1, so it’s not clear what “unspecified” means.

Discretionary Revisions: I made many “discretionary revisions” that you can see in the attached Word document that I am submitting. In the attached document, my revisions appear underlined in red. Most of them are minor grammar corrections, or stylistic edits. I submit these corrections and edits from my viewpoint as a person who is fluent only in English, and who has lived in the U.S. all of my life. I have not read much international literature, and read mostly American medical journals. Therefore, my corrections and edits may not be necessary if the audience is an international audience or an audience outside of the U.S.

Level of interest: An article of importance in its field

Quality of written English: Needs some language corrections before being published

Statistical review: No, the manuscript does not need to be seen by a statistician.
