PEER REVIEWER COMMENTS:

GENERAL COMMENTS: The major issue raised is the differing approaches and understanding of ACP discussions across disciplines. The need for a more person centred approach might fall to professionals such as nurses where a more relation centred approach may be taken to understand an individuals underlying personal preferences as well as the 'harder' more medically orientated choices in to prefer medical interventions, or not.
This is a second paper from the original study that provides the qualitative results of the interview of the professionals involved in ACP discussions. This is a well conducted and written study that is interesting and easy to rad and assimilate. I particularly wish to acknowledge their lack of jargon and reader friendly style of writing. There are a couple of typos that will likely be managed in the editorial processes; one example being P4, line 10; 'were' used but author probably means 'where' and a missing word, P8, line 22; ...last phase of the resident's........?........, are.....
