Title: A Case of Silicone Oil Adhered to the Retinal Surface via Perfluorocarbon Liquid

Version: 0 Date: 02 Jan 2018

Reviewer: Scott Brodie

Reviewer’s report:

Fukumoto and colleagues report a single case of silicone oil adherent to a bubble of perfluorocarbon liquid immediately at the conclusion of a vitrectomy procedure. There were able to successfully remove the silicone oil by first removing the underlying bubble of perfluorocarbon liquid.

The report of this intriguing incident is clear and concise. I am not myself an active vitrectomy surgeon, and so cannot comment on the novelty of the events described in this manuscript.

One correction is needed: in the first line on page 5, the text should read "sticky SO becoming tightly adhered to the retinal surface 1 via PFCL." instead of "sticky SO becoming tightly adhered to the corneal surface 1 via PFCL."
