Reviewer's report:

Thank you for the opportunity to review this revised manuscript.

There is significant change to the manuscript

I will comment on the answers to my questions.

The correction to figure 1 is substantially different to the original manuscript and clarifies the sample population.

I suggest that the authors moderate their suggestions (that paediatricians should "pay attention" to babies whose mothers had gained a lot of weight or used insulin) as these have significant implications on resource that are not supported confidently by such a small study.

The language should also be revised from a clinical angle. For example, in table 1, it is unusual to state "case of the mother used insulin". Rather, it would be more commonly phrased as "maternal insulin" or "maternal insulin-use". Repeating "case" with each variable is redundant and stilted.

Are the methods appropriate and well described?
