The authors provide an excellent exposition of an important problem. However there is a conceptual problem of diagnosing affective and anxiety disorders among persons with intellectual disabilities which the authors speculate is due to 1) the patients' expressive limitations due to intellectual disabilities, and 2) providers' limitations in recognizing separate disorders among patients with intellectual disabilities. May it also be true that the DSM5 diagnostic categories are limited as well in their application to persons with intellectual diabetes? There are other minor copy editor criticisms. The LSS should be explained in the abstract as it is in the text. It would be more elegant to use "affective" and "anxiety" disorders rather than repeating the numerals F3 and F4 in the text. One presumes that he LSS groups excluded from analysis were those with physical disabilities. Finally the authors captured a category of "injury" but did not mention suicide attempts or self injury. Are those data available? If not why not?
