Title: Measuring the Quality of Care in Nursing Home Residents with Early-onset Neurodegenerative Diseases: A scoping review

Version: 0 Date: 16 Dec 2019

Reviewer: Sabine Bartholomeyczik

Reviewer's report:

This manuscript deals with an important question referring to nursing home residents for whom nursing homes often seem not to be adequate.

Basic assumption for the research question is that this special group of patients "needs more complex care" than "regular" residents in nursing homes. However, this statement is not very well explained except for describing living circumstances in younger ages. What does this mean for the quality of care and how should this be represented when assessing QoC. This should be discussed, mainly because the results seem to hide any differences between the focused residents and "regular" ones.

Please start with the information that you refer to neurodegenerative diseases other than pure dementia.

The keywords should include early onset… or the most common disease in this group.

Are the methods appropriate and well described?
