Reviewer's report:

Dear Editor, BMC CAM,

The authors presented data about the genotoxic effect of a traditional Korean herb widely used in China. The study is of low quality and the treatment doses used by authors do not rule out the toxic effect of the herb at such high concentrations even if there are no obvious genotoxic effect. In addition, genotoxic effect is preferably be judged first on gametes cells, liver and heart cells as well as kidney cells. Also, the authors need to assess the toxic effect on the Liver, heart and kidney using clinical and histopathological tests to document the potential effect at the cellular levels then move a step forward to check its effect on DNA. The authors didn't explain the rational of using such high concentrations of the extract to treat the animals.

Are the methods appropriate and well described?
