Title: A pre-post study testing a lung cancer screening decision aid in primary care

Reviewer's report:

The authors have addressed my earlier comments with varying degrees of enthusiasm. The end product is satisfactory in most respects, but on one topic there really is more they need to say. I drew attention to the financial incentive to participate in their study and to the potential deterrent effect - not just in the research - of having to make an extra visit, and I made the general point that many factors will have been involved in the translation of stated preferences into behaviour. The authors however talk only about the likely relevance of 'other knowledge domains', which misses the point completely: knowledge is just one part of a much more complex picture and that really must be acknowledged if the paper is not to mislead its readership.
