There are three constructs contained within the survey to be estimated by 14 items... It is noted that reliability estimates are given for this overall scale however,

1. with such a small sample of participants, and with each of the three constructs to be tested by a small survey, some reliability issues of the three constructs is questionable. This needs to be emphasized in the limitations of the study

2. the five-point Likert scale used contains a neutral category (scored at zero) .....Item response theory (it is noted you are using classical test theory), argues that the retention of the neutral category interrupts the continuity in both the direction and intensity of the construct being estimated and should be removed for more accurate estimation
