Title: Prenatal Maternal and Childhood Bisphenol A Exposure and Brain Structure and Behavior of Young Children

Version: 1 Date: 07 Aug 2019

Reviewer: Roberta White

Reviewer's report:

This revised manuscript addresses almost all of this reviewer's concerns about the initial MS. The one exception is in regard to the underlying hypothesis related to white matter disruption and scores on the CBCL. The authors state that prior research has shown that BPA exposure is related to poorer externalizing and internalizing scores and that white matter disruption is very likely with prenatal and early childhood exposure. But they don't state why they think that white matter abnormalities would be related to CBCL scores. It would seem to this reviewer that there are other brain structures and systems that are more obviously related to CBCL outcomes.
