Title: Successful occlusion of ventricular septal rupture in myocardial infarction under the guidance of echocardiography

Version: 0 Date: 15 May 2019

Reviewer's report:

Interesting case report, English is very poor and clinical details are missing. For instance, what were the characteristics of the heart murmur, when was the "old" myocardial infarction, which VSD device was used. The authors claim that this is a new technique, however I believe that it has been attempted for at least 10 years with some success in some selected patients. The survival of this patient makes it a valid case report, but I don't think the novelty of the procedure is a claimable at this point.
